SUBJECT:	A Framework Built on Everything You've Been Saying — Can We Talk?

Email Body:

Mike,

You have spent years making a case that almost everyone agrees with and almost no one acts on: that America has systematically devalued the practical skills, hands-on work, and civic contribution that actually hold communities together. The National Experiential Civic Education Framework is the structural answer to exactly that problem — and I think you are one of the few people in America who could help make it real.

NECEF proposes embedding practical, hands-on civic programs in schools: community service, emergency preparedness training, infrastructure stewardship, and collaborative leadership challenges. No lectures. No worksheets. Actual work, in actual communities, with actual stakes. Students graduate knowing how to apply first aid, how to maintain public infrastructure, how to lead a team through a crisis.

This aligns precisely with what mikeroweWORKS has championed: the dignity of practical contribution, the value of skills developed through doing, and the idea that a society that stops teaching its young people how to work together stops being a functional society.

You reach an audience that no politician can reach — working Americans across the political spectrum who are skeptical of government programs but deeply believe in community, service, and personal responsibility. Your voice on this would do more to build cross-partisan momentum than almost any other single endorsement.

I am not asking for a political endorsement. I am asking you to look at this framework and tell me if you think it captures what you have been talking about for years. The full white paper is attached. I would love to have that conversation.

With genuine admiration,

Gina Aulabaugh
